day in the life: supply chain management manager

I think the greatest thing about our country is that you will find a little bit of everything. You can find beach. You can find dessert. You can find forest. Angola is blessed with the great riches of nature. Working for chevron gives me the opportunity to preserve and to protect all of that beauty.

I'm Eliana Coelho. Every day, I'm trying to shape our supply chain to make sure that we are delivering, in terms of safety, in terms of performance, in terms of value. We want to make sure that we are producing the barrels in a safe manner, in a reliable manner, and in a very cost-efficient manner. Partnerships are very important to Chevron and to me. This is what we do every day. Partnership is with our communities. Partnership is with our suppliers. Partnership is with our operating partners.

Chevron is the partner of choice, and we want to continue being that partner of choice. That's why we need to continue doing our business with integrity and trust, so we can continue building those partnerships wherever we go to operate.

Chevron has been a constant for 60 years in Angola. We develop business with local suppliers. It impacts whole communities. We're making a difference and that feels good. I see that every day.

The thing that differentiates Chevon from a lot of other companies is definitely the people. We are human energy. The people truly embody the values of The Chevron Way. The culture is in the people. Just like Chevron symbolizes human energy, I think Angolans and Luanda symbolize energy as well because of the people, and that makes all of the difference.
